

INVESTMENT POLICY OF THE FUND

MARKET SUMMARY

In October, U.S. stocks reached new record highs, buoyed by a strong corporate earnings season and a rotation into small-cap stocks. The ongoing strength in corporate earnings, particularly beyond the technology sector, provided a positive backdrop for equities. In line with this, our quantitative models suggested taking equity risk. Accordingly, the Fund maintained a balanced portfolio of US and European large cap stocks during October. During the month, ASM International was the worst performer and KLA-Tencor the best performer in our portfolio. However, the market was not without its challenges. Short-term Treasury yields surged, as markets began to price out expectations for Federal Reserve rate cuts. This shift was largely driven by persistent inflation concerns, particularly in the services sector, where wage growth remained robust. The core Personal Consumption Expenditures (PCE) index, the Fed's preferred inflation gauge, showed signs of stickiness, leading to speculation that the central bank may not cut rates as aggressively as previously anticipated. Geopolitical tensions, particularly in the Middle East, added another layer of uncertainty. The escalation of conflict raised concerns about potential impacts on oil prices and broader market stability. While the immediate market reaction was muted, the potential for further escalation could heighten volatility in the coming weeks. The upcoming presidential election was another source of concern for market participants. In Europe, the European Central Bank (ECB) cut interest rates for the third time this year, signaling a more aggressive approach to monetary policy in response to weak economic growth and contracting business activity. This contrasted with the U.S. outlook, where the economy showed resilience, leading to a divergence in market expectations between the two regions.
